January

New Year, New Subjects

As students return to class January 6, they'll be further enriching their knowledge in Science, Technology, Engineering and Mathematics (STEM) with a close-up look at what makes "wool" so wonderful, and lessons about the various states of matter. Pro tip: they ALL matter.

The Party Continues!

For those who observe the Lunar or Lunisolar calendars, the celebration is still ahead. Students will take part in multicultural celebrations January 30th and 31st - marking the Lunar New Year with a yoga workshop. Luckily, it's also pyjama day, and loose-fitting clothing like pyjamas is perfect for yoga. Talk about good timing!

New Spin on Show-and-Tell

Confident Communicators (three-year-olds) will now take part in a little "Draw-and-Tell." They'll be sent home with construction paper to create a masterpiece, then they'll elaborate on their artistic vision for the class on their designated day.

Remarkable Readers (four-year-olds) will take it up a notch with "Cut-and-Collage." It's the same idea, but students will cut out pictures from newspapers and magazines (remember those?) and create a picture story to share with the class.

Reminder: books don't grow on trees

Well, I mean technically the paper does... but books cost money. If a library book is lost, parents can replace them with another age-appropriate book, or they will be charged $5

Lovely Literacy, Nice Numeracy

In January, three-year-old students will work on recognition of the letters of the alphabet in random order, and words with pictures. Four-year-olds will progress to three-letter words. Children will also learn about ascending and descending orders of numbers.

Dress for Seasonal Stress

In case you haven't noticed – it's been cold! Remember to send plenty of warm winter clothing every day. It's more comfortable for fun time outdoors, and it's especially necessary in the event of an emergency situation.

Wasn't That a Party?

Students put on a heck of a holiday hootenanny December 20th.
